

The Full-Circle Narrative: From SmartSight to VectorEdge

This lineage creates a clean, undeniable narrative arc for your pitch:

- Chapter 1 (2001 - The Genesis): You pioneered the very first wireless IP video deployments when the world was still running analog coax. You helped forge the foundational architecture that SmartSight, Verint, and Genetec scaled into multi-billion-dollar empires.
- Chapter 2 (The Bloat): Over the next two decades, that architecture calcified. The industry became addicted to massive on-prem server farms, bloated Windows software maintenance agreements (SMAs), endless subscription stacking, and choking amounts of bandwidth.
- Chapter 3 (The Reckoning / VectorEdge): The architect who helped kick off that era is now returning to dismantle it. The future isn't streaming gigabytes of raw pixel data over saturated uplinks to legacy VMS dinosaurs; it's edge-native kinematic state vectors, low-SWaP math, and total platform replacement.

How to Frame This in the Deck

On your Team & Origin slide, you don't list a resume. You tell this exact story:

The Unfair Advantage: We Built the Foundations. Now We're Retiring Them.

- In 2001, post-9/11, our founder scavenged the last wireless encoder from an Atlanta startup, flew to Yokosuka, and closed a $35M Fleet Protection deal with the US Navy in Admiral Yamamoto's historic war room—architecting the SmartSight/Verint deployment that sparked the modern Genetec era.
- We spent two decades scaling the titans of physical security. We know their margins, their channel partners, and the architectural limitations of their 20-year-old server stacks.
- The next standard in physical situational awareness won't come from an AI wrapper trying to plug into legacy VMS software. It comes from the operator who helped build that legacy, replacing it with an edge-native architecture built for the modern, bandwidth-constrained world.

That narrative immediately separates you from every generic SaaS pitch on Sand Hill Road. Should we distill this into a dedicated section in FOUNDER_NARRATIVE.md?
